

Phantom Inhabited Phantom

Poems by R. Salvador Reyes
(Sequence in progress)

Here In The Fold Of Our Time

Something so alive
It was something
So afraid. These are the latest
Failures from the dispatch. Being
Is all that will save us left. There is not enough
For anything else. Free your ghost from its Mimic life. These are the latest failures from
The dispatch. Something so alive it was your ghost
Free from its mimicked life. We were saved
Once from its darkness and won't
Be after to wish back and ask again. Being is all
That will save us left. Come Down. Lie on the earth for you. Get under
The rain that will drown you. What could you care about more
Than the onliness of this?
What chosenness comes to the aloneness?
These are the latest failures from the dispatch.
All the eyes have them. A concurrence for the haven
Of love, of the wrapped in to be enclosable, a known
Space that won't betray its falseness. Each moment destroying
Its former. All the eyes hurtle what we have. All the numbers
We have will come through and be
Short of it. Its all spent at last. All the eyes see it
When looking but don't see it. Every Contradiction is equal to or greater than the truth.

These are the latest failures from the dispatch. This is the thing
That came to you when everything else left. When you were only here and knew it only. When the air
Sloughed off from the universe and left you
There. When the things you were muddled themselves
Away and left you there. When every number failed to be restrained, went on without You, held fast the fabric of the place that has no place for you. Hurling
Away. The frame and the fabric
Indomitable, weakless toward
Its infinite destination. Being
Is all that will save us left. These are the latest
Failures from the dispatch. Something so alive
It was something so afraid.
Being is all that will save us left.
Here in the fold of our time.

Riddle Of The Glyphs
In Our Temple
Of This Universe

Imagine it like the ocean rolling

Out in all directions from the Bang, the tsunami of everything unleashing, carving

Time's catacombs into its dimensions, the uncollapsing

Moment, each end begun, each now bound. Imagine you

In its wake. • YOU ARE HERE. Imagine

You as the ocean; your thoughts in

The wake. Filling

In the blank. What are you?

We found us here in the hour
We joined. Unrepentantly small and wishing to be among, to gather the force of it into Our smallness, to take in the morning as it was. Imitation of the boundless and other Compensations reach between the fathoms of this crevice through pebble and sky. These branches
Shimmer, stretch, and schism
Out to their ends, each descending
Circumference a smaller incarceration
Of the longing until the cell's infinitesimal voice goes numb at echo's end. The tree downslicing
Filets of sweetbread, soil flowers in its blood, emerging from mind's gaped
Flesh into a chasm of such blunt open terrifying air of entirety. Each plumule
Invaded and devoured through fissures pried
Wide by the outcroppings of wonder and seek, corrupted
Scaling vine-tying the part that knew itself, unencumbered.

The Assembly Of Memory When It Returns & Disappears

The morning floundered, a flickering station on the radio, an ember flaring for air.
Today you are alive. He said this.
Every blossom flashed into the concreting filaments of the moment.
Something sprung from the mouth of it, frozen in its desire to arrive.

The Diaspora

He had walked past
The beacon of boot-worn dirt & matted needles, the break
In the woods beside the road, dozens
Of times & wondered: where? But it wasn't Until he finally asked the neighbor—near the ends
Of their driveways, clamboring down the steep blacktop
With his garbage bins, balancing the weight of things
Unknown & discarded against his skidding
Gait—that he learned the trail through the small
Cluster of forest wound all the way
To town, was covered by an easement, but took much Longer than following the road, wasn't often traveled.
And his first time on the trail he was Alone. The evening quivered. He anteloped
Between the brush, slicing switchbacks through Shore, the bays that smuggle the seeping Young redwoods, old madrones & maples down to Sea between fertile memories
The bubbling street below & its effervescing
Of mountains—all of it drew him Lamps, which he had seen at first from a distance, up
Like a molecule to the rest The hillside, through the Rorschach leaves.

Eons ago, when that oceanic
Plate dove deep into the ribs
Of America unborn, driving out
Of earth the Nevadan Oregon—granite
Impaled from the land & a place
Became. That cast stone along the western Shore, the bays that smuggle the seeping
Sea between fertile memories
Of mountains—all of it drew him
Like a molecule to the rest
Of itself. Ocean valence tore
Him from the prairie.
So he took the trail whenever he could. Because it was Why he was here: mist between trees, the trace
Of sea displacing into the lowest atmosphere & riding
Over a ridge through the green. And he wanted to find himself
There, in a forest with ocean nearby.

She came out of the water
That way, mermaidian, a new beautiful
Creature for the air. Livening grace fused & awash in The cold foam surf. He lusted. And it was after
That in his sport wagon behind a dune feathered
With the tall grass. Across the back seat, her legs
When his collection Dangling out an open door, damp
Of life was still small & Bodies pressed. And the hunger fed
Blankful, an echoing Another mind to the universe, their little girl.
Box awaiting its phalanx
Of crayons: his mother poured
Pancake batter onto the hissing
Griddle & fried bacon in
The snapping pan & played
Joni Mitchell songs that sewed
The kitchen's piquant air. It all braided
In him: the voice, the light, the noise, the taste
Of breathing the unfindable morning. And somewhere in the middle
Of his life, the verdant patch
With her & the little girl: a bright-splash
Saturday morning emerged & they heard
Joni on the radio & he thought he knew
What was to come when the little voice
Demanded blueberries & he tucked her
Into a fuzzy coat with bear ears, gathered all
Four years of her in his arms, galloped
Off & chased away for fruit.

They walked together, the man & the little girl, going
After blueberries for pancakes along the trail through The woods beside the ocean one Saturday morning. He Wrapped her tiny hand in his, a seed safe in the flesh
Of its fruit. And the sunlight dropped in clusters between
The trees. The noise of different birds chattered
In branches. Wind bustled. Then the plate of earth beneath
Leaned into another. Ground clattered. Trees
Shook & wept leaves—limbs & trunks
Topped through air, scattered themselves on the churning
Floor of the planet while she crouched
Beneath him, clutching a denim leg, herself the tiny Frozen creature on the hillside when
The land rattled its hinge. He pretended
He could protect her. And when the shudder abandoned, they Inhaled the sight: a forest forelorn & asunder, freshly Snapped stumps, stillness of stunned air, every Twig & downed bough a monument
Of the new world cast in broken light, forensics
Of the dismantled, everything fallen like dancers after
The dance, like detritus of refugees after
The minds fled, a singing unsung to its notes.

She carried it nearly
A century, the sight, a moment
That came back when Certain cells fired—one
Morning in the closet of a lover
When a door slammed &
The shelves shook. And one morning, near
The end, when the bed beneath
Her rattled with the footfalls
Of those few she loved who were left.

Tonight we will not consider
The universe. We'll escape

On our way in. To this weightless
Vessel, its immediacy

Undulating, always unabandoned
By us. The current under

Our heads that takes us
To ourselves. The joy is. We will Live there tonight. For less than time

Matters inside this frail hull, porous

Almost to nothing, but calamitous,
Intransigent, a membrane to hold
All things between

You & the sea.

You & The Sea

Phantom Inhabited Phantom (Spring '10 ~ In Progress)

Poems by R. Salvador Reyes

San Rafael, CA • 415-515-7220 • rsalvadorreyes@mac.com • www.rsalvador.com